Excerpt: ... Backstopper. Not a bad chap that. Sports his money very free--sings an uncommon good song. Thomas. Pretty voice, but no cultivation. Lackey (who re-enters). Be here at two oclock for Miss N, Take anything? Come round the corner.--Theres a capital shop round the corner. Exeunt Servants. Scene II. Ethel. I cant think where Madame de Montcontour has gone. How very odd it was that you should come here--that we should both come here to-day! How surprised I was to see you at the Ministers! Grandmamma was so angry! That boy pursues us wherever we go, she said. I am sure I dont know why we shouldnt meet, Clive. It seems to be wrong even my seeing you by chance here. Do you know, sir, what a scolding I had about--about going to Brighton with you? My grandmother did not hear of it till we were in Scotland, when that foolish maid of mine talked of it to her maid; and there was oh, such a tempest! If there were a Bastile here, she would like to lock you into it. She says that you are always upon our way--I dont know how, I am sure. She says, but for you I should have been--you know what I should have been: but I am thankful that I wasnt, and Kew has got a much nicer wife in Henrietta Pulleyn, than I could ever have been to him. She will be happier than Clara, Clive. Kew is one of the kindest creatures in the world--not very wise; not very strong: but he is just such a kind, easy, generous, little man, as will make a girl like Henrietta quite happy. Clive. But not you, Ethel? Ethel. No, nor I him. My temper is difficult, Clive, and I fear few men would bear with me. I feel, somehow, always very lonely. How old am I? Twenty--I feel sometimes as if I was a hundred; and in the midst of nil these admirations and fetes and flatteries, so tired, oh, so tired! And...
