Not illustrated. 1838 Excerpt: ...and I retired to our apartments. How disagreeable an evenings adventure! Not one of the party seemed satisfied except Sir Clement, who,was in high spirits: but Madame Duval was enraged at meeting with him; Mr; Branghton, angry with his children; the frolic of the Miss Branghtons had exceeded their plan, and ended in their own distress; their brother was provoked that there had been no riot; Mr. Brown was tired, and Mr. Smith mortified. As to myself, I must acknowledge, nothing could be more disagreeable to me than being seen by Sir Clement Willoughby with a party at once so vulgar in themselves, and so familiar to me. And you, too, my dear sir, will, I know, be sorry that I have met liim: however, there is no apprehension of his visiting here: as Madame Duval is far too angry to admit him. Madame Duval rose very late this morning, and, at one oclock, we had but just breakfasted, when Miss Branghton, her brother, Mr. Smith, and Monsieur du Bois, called to inquire after our healths. This civility in young Branghton, I much suspect, was merely the result of his fathers commands; but his sister and Mr. Smith, I soon found, had motives of their own. Scarce had they spoken to Madame Duval, when, advancing eagerly to me, Pray, maam, said Mr. Smith, who was that gentleman? Pray, cousin,I cried Miss Branghton, was not he the same gentleman you ran away with that night at the opera? Goodness! that he was, said young Branghton; and, I declare, as soon as ever I saw him, I thought I knew his face. Im sure Ill defy you to forget him, answered his sister,-if once you had seen him: he is the finest gentleman I ever saw in my life; d...
