

Within the Tides

[...] I engaged an assistant only to stop your preaching about the evils of solitude, said Renouard hastily; and the pressman laughed at the half-resentful tone. His laugh was not very loud, but his plump person shook all over. He was aware that his younger friends deference to his advice was based only on an imperfect belief in his wisdom or his sagacity. But it was he who had first helped Renouard in his plans of exploration: the five-years programme of scientific adventure, of work, of danger and endurance, carried out with such distinction and rewarded modestly with the lease of Malata island by the frugal colonial government. And this reward, too, had been due to the journalists advocacy with word and pen for he was an influential man in the community. Doubting very much if Renouard really liked him, he was himself without great sympathy for a certain side of that man which he could not quite make out. He only felt it obscurely to be his real personality the true and, perhaps, the absurd. As, for instance, in that case of the assistant. Renouard had given way to the arguments of his friend and backed the argument against the unwholesome effect of solitude, the argument for the safety of companionship[...].
